What is Lead Management?

Let's start with the typical textbook definition of Lead Management: Lead Management is defined as the methodology, process, and software used to reach prospective customers and convert them into buyers using targeted sales and management strategies. This process is very important for all businesses no matter how small or big they are, to grow and form a bigger loyal customer base for their products.

Before we jump into the details of lead management, let's first understand what exactly is a lead. A lead refers to an individual or a company that has expressed interest in your products. This interest could be expressed in multiple ways. For example, the most common one we all know is subscribing to your newsletter before the launch of your product or following the launch journey leading up to launch day via different social media platforms, etc. Here is where the lead management system comes into place in assisting you to convert this lead into a source of revenue for your company. The lead management system comes up with a Plan of Action in a systematic way while laying a path for the lead to go up to make the purchase.

To put it more simply, Lead management is defined simply as "the process of addressing leads constantly and equally" in the traditional sense. Theoretically, it makes sense, but let's look at a real-world example first. Consider the scenario when you approach a small shop on foot, are welcomed with a smile, and are assisted in choosing the appropriate products based on your budget. On his register, the store owner keeps track of membership points.

The owner ignores the need for a better method to record their data and points as the company expands and more consumers sign up for the given membership as time goes on since he is unwilling to hire more reps. Because of the increased business, the sales representatives are too busy to pay attention to you. Your disappointment at the store's neglect and poor reaction causes you to stop going there. However, with the increase, there would have been happier consumers if the store owner had a good system to feed data and additional salespeople employed.

To have a quicker reaction time and have salespeople engage with context, it is generally necessary to highlight the necessity for a Lead Management system. If a salesperson kept urging you to buy the newest energy drink while trying to buy shampoo, for example, or if they took a long time to tell you where the appropriate aisle is, you would be furious.

In business language, lead management refers to collecting leads, monitoring their behaviors and preferences, preparing them for sales by providing ongoing attention, and then handing them over to the sales team.

Like you'd love to visit the store where you regularly shop, get assistance making decisions based on your budget, and receive free subscription emails for future deals and discounts. Using the store scenario, you can better comprehend the requirement for lead management.

When your company deals with big volumes of clients or employees who have several leads to chase, lead management tools are necessary.

Segmentation of Leads:

Once sales have accepted a lead, you should follow up further to determine which nurturing, and follow-up methods would be most successful based on how prepared they are to buy a similar product or service.

Following the first qualification, the following important indications can be used to further segment leads:

- If they are unfamiliar with your organization mainly, find out what they think and how they feel about your sector or business.
- Find out what makes them choose a company that offers your product or service (Have they bought anything comparable before, is this a new issue for which they're seeking a solution, etc.).
- Determine which aspects of your product or service are likely interested in.
- Determine which marketing avenues will likely be most successful in attracting their attention.

These segmentation-related queries will enable you to precisely map tactics for nurturing and converting the generated leads. The lead qualification and segmentation processes are essential to creating a successful lead nurturing campaign.

What are the 5 stages of Lead Management?

1. Defining a quality lead - This is what we call your first touch in understanding your product from a customer's point of view. This step will give you an insight into your Lead Management journey. The process of defining a good lead will include your sales and marketing team reaching common ground with the basic definitions as these two departments have a different understanding of all aspects of the definition of a lead. The current Lead Management Systems available consider the following to be an appropriate checklist for defining a Quality lead.

- Is there a consumer base that is truly interested in what your product range is? The main aim of asking the question is to understand if you have enough data to clearly define the consumer base you are targeting for your specific product. It is important to understand if you have competitors in the current market and also to know how your product stands out in the current time to attract consumers. In a lot of instances, you would have consumers just looking at your products and not necessarily buying any of them, or you may have competitors trying to understand what you have to offer. These situations would reflect as numbers but having said that, they are not necessarily converted to revenue. This situation is where we help you understand which lead is important for you in respect of converting it into a source of revenue.
- Does the consumer have a use for my product? This is a vital piece of information while we are defining a quality lead. In this part not only do we consider the immediate reaction of the customer but also a long-term goal to gauge if the consumer would make regular use of the products. Unless there is a long-term goal defined, the turnover over the products would be very minimal.
- Is the product correctly priced? It is important to understand that while pricing the product we understand its feasibility if it is affordable to a broad section of the consumer base and also give strong competition to the established brands that already have similar products.
- Is the timeline to launch the product correctly? We have to understand that launching a product at a specific time for it to flourish in the market. The timing can make or break the future of the product. There is a lot to consider before establishing the timeline. Some of the factors that are considered before deciding the time are the general economic situation in the country, to also understanding if the competitors are launching similar products around the same time, and observing general market demand in the relevant industry.

- Is the consumer in target the Ultimate decider? In this scenario in an ideal world, it would be fantastic to have all the Ultimate deciders in a family to have as our consumer base, but we understand that wouldn't be the case usually, but having an understanding of this will only help us further improve our overall sales and marketing strategy.

2. Setting up a standardized lead scoring system: What exactly do we mean by lead scoring? A lead scoring system is a process that helps both a sales representative and a marketing analyst to understand and identify the group of consumers who are more likely to buy the product and who would become the prime target for us.

- How do you score a lead? The most basic way to score a lead is to simply assign a numeric value to different types of responses received from the consumer. These numbers help us analyze the sales and potential problems that are preventing the sales from going through.
- Lead Scoring Model: A typical lead scoring model needs to cover the following features that would provide you the precise data and give you a clear understanding of the potential sales that would go through perfectly.
 - An alliance of Marketing-Sales: Your sales and marketing departments need to reach an understanding in generating the scoring model. Discrepancies on this will lead to either us losing great leads or assuming the not-so-great leads to great leads and result in following up the wrong path
 - An agreed threshold: You need to set a threshold value to indicate when the lead is ready to move to sales. The threshold has to be set very carefully as this is the primary value that determines if the lead is ready to graduate to leads or be pursued further in Marketing.
 - Explicit & Implicit Scoring: Explicit scoring is when you assign points to specific objectives which include the following: Job Title, Tenure, Experience, Industry, Company Size, Company revenue, Geographic location, etc, and the list goes on. It is a non-exhaustive list, the above are just a few examples. On the other hand, implicit scoring is when you assign a value to the behavior-based actions of a lead. This might simply include website visits, opening the links on the advertisement, reaching out to us via social media, reaching the landing page, checking different products we offer, etc. Again, this list is non-exhaustive as well. We come up with the most appropriate markers depending on your products.

- Negative Scoring: Negative scoring comes in when we potentially see a decline in the above things, a simple example can be unsubscribing from your website's newsletter and latest promotions.
- Regular refinement: All of the above scores should also be reviewed periodically to not get stagnant results and keep up with the ever-changing dynamic market situation.

3. Mapping end to end to understand the customer's journey: This is where we come into play to help you track and manage every lead that is put out there. This tracking and management give us precise insight to implement the right sales and marketing strategies. Each lead always goes through two stages in the process, the first is with the Marketing department, where they follow up on leads and pass the one that crosses the threshold over to the Sales department, which gives them a sort of confirmation to say these are the right ones in which they are investing their time and energy. Let's just say it is a bit similar to the popular Two-Factor authentication concept.
4. Form a process to follow up each lead end to end: Mapping end to end of a customer's journey once is never enough to come up with a sales plan that won't break your backbone in the long run, which is why we form a process that allows us to follow up each lead to understand their requirements in the long run that enables to serve them right and give an insight into the dynamic market.
5. Form a process to Nurture your leads: Not only do we need to follow up on leads, and try to create new ones for a broader consumer base, but we should also nurture the ones we have. It could be a simple gesture to explain the progress the company has made in general or notify them about the progress on a new product expected to release soon. This gives us information about our most loyal consumer base which we need to hold on to.

Importance of Lead Management

Lead management is a critical activity if a company wishes to engage in direct communication with potential customers after marketing to attract them. Since the process affects both marketing and sales activity, it is crucial for team alignment if your company has separate sales and marketing teams. Even if not, handling leads will help you maximize the impact of your marketing efforts.

Even though managing leads is essential for effective marketing and, more crucially, sales, many firms merely have ad hoc guidelines in place. Compared to the number of potential customers that indicated interest, this can result in a low percentage of those purchasing a good or service. Have you heard of it?

Personalized re-engagement is vital to winning clients' business, according to 70% of customers, and it normally takes 6–8 interactions or calls for a lead to turn into a sale. Thirty percent of leads are never followed up on.

How many more sales could you generate if you used a documented, repeatable procedure to guarantee that every lead was followed up with relevant, regular messaging? Utilize smart lead management to maximize your sales and marketing efforts and boost sales!

In an ideal world, how would you understand which lead management system would you need, or how would you understand it is time to upgrade to the now available next-gen LMS that is more compatible with the constantly changing world? Here are a few pointers that might be hinting to you that you might need the upgrade

- There is no consolidated single source of incoming information regarding leads
- The leads graduating from Marketing are not great and are being incorrectly sent
- There is no clear understanding of Lead's behavior
- Great opportunities are frequently overlooked
- The conversion rates are poor

If even one or two of the above points speak to you right now, it indicates your company needs a much-deserved upgrade to flourish in the market before it gets lost. Having said all of this, is getting an upgrade enough to make a difference? Of course not, You also need to decide who will be in charge of your Lead Management System. But firstly to give you a context before you decide to choose, please have an outlook of what stages entail in a Lead Management System:

Lead Management Stages:

These are the primary stages, as seen in the chart below. It's important to remember that the positioning of stages can be altered to suit your company's needs.

Lead Capture Automation: Thanks to new technologies, leads may be collected automatically because manual techniques are inefficient and prone to mistakes. A suitable mechanism or software must be utilized to accurately feed the lead to the point of origin, like a good jigsaw fit to prevent accidents like lead leakage.

The program must be able to assess the sources that offer the best leads and returns. Removing money-sucking leads greatly aids marketing and business intelligence teams in restructuring budgets.

Lead tracking: It is essential to pursue leads once they have been obtained.

Each lead needs to have their habits, preferences, and activities monitored. This should cover things like the websites or pages they visited, the forms or subscriptions they filled out, the pricing they compared, or, in the modern day, the tracking of your phones.

Tracking enables preferences to be identified, allowing for appropriate customization.

Lead Distribution: Without a sound system to guide it, managing many leads generated from various sources might be a nightmare. Following track, leads are forwarded along with sizeable sales.

The system automatically assigns the appropriate teams to pursue according to the rationale specified by each lead. This speeds up response times, prevents misunderstandings, and ensures authorities are directed to the appropriate people with solid credentials.

Lead Qualification: These days, as soon as the teams receive leads, they evaluate them to determine their value. Numerous approaches, such as rating or scoring, are employed to separate unsuitable leads from those that are worthwhile.

A lead's value is determined by various elements, such as the demographic information provided or the lead's commitment to the business. Each lead is given a score by the lead qualification systems and CRM depending on the likelihood that it will close.

Nothing beats human interaction for determining the seriousness and tenacity of the consumer, even though every quality ranking and score aid in analyzing the persona.

Lead Nurturing: After a lead is qualified, follow up with them and move on. Each lead needs to be examined, separated into perspective maybes and certain ones, and then tailored.

There may be instances where leads are not interested in buying or never make a purchase. But when given accurate information, anyone can support a brand, sale, or no sale. This could include blog postings of gratitude or gifts.

The system's biggest and most crucial component is figuring out how to engage leads and pursue them. Here, the leads are persuaded through various media and material that appeals to them, such as drip emails, SMS, and social media.

Keep in mind that lead generation with lead nurturing equals more success.

How to Make Use of our Lead Management System?

Define the lead you want:

Not all leads are the best fits for your business. It's critical to specify your ideal lead's requirements in detail.

What is your process, then?

Developing an Ideal Customer Profile (ICP)

An ideal customer profile (ICP) is a concise document that identifies the perfect consumer for the goods or services offered by your business. You can use this profile as a guide to qualifying any leads who contact your brand.

You might need to consider a few factors when developing the appropriate ICP for your company profile. Several instances could be:

- Does your ideal client operate in a certain industry?
- Location: Does your company target a certain area or demographic?
- How many staff do you have? Is your product only intended for a select group of customers?
- Budget: What is the lowest amount a customer should pay to use your services?
- Are you limiting your consumer base because of legal considerations related to age, region, or governmental status?

To define your ICP, your company might need some or all of these profiles. Understanding this checklist will make it extremely simple to qualify or disqualify leads. By doing this, you can guarantee that your sales team is spending time with leads that are a better fit.

Divide up your lead pool:

No matter what kind of goods or services you offer, a variety of people with various needs will make up your target market. Lead segmentation outlines your attempts to provide distinct customer types with customized customer experiences based on their demands and business requirements.

To give your leads the appropriate solutions for their needs, you must decide on the criteria on which to segment your leads. These characteristics may include information about a person's demographics, behavior, location, psychology, and many other things.

Advantages of Using Lead Management System:

- Reporting and analytics capabilities: You must have already understood at this point how important is to monitor your leads constantly. The Lead management system does that for you along with producing regular reports which enable you to form a plan of action tailored to your needs.
- Efficient Lead Tracking: When you rely on someone whose sole purpose is to track the lead's journey end to end, the tracking and feedback automatically become more efficient, don't you agree?
- Lead Prioritization: The system gives you exact details to understand which lead has a high score that needs immediate attention to be converted to revenue. At the same time, it also gives you insight on leads that have a gradual increase in their scores that indicate a purchase in long term, hence covering both your short and long-term goals
- Optimized Sales team efficiency: When given the right information, we all know how our sales team can thrive. Give them the power with our software to be the best in the field
- Improved team coordination: A successful sales process depends on effective departmental communication. We all know at times how hard it gets to establish a common ground between two entirely different teams, Sales and Marketing, but our software will give you the correct tools to make that possible. You may connect marketing and sales directly with the help of lead management software, which also gives you a better understanding of how the actions of one team affect those of the other.

- Improved consumer insight: Discover what your customers like, what they react to, and how they behave. Finding the practices that aren't working is crucial so you can either improve your current strategy for a better response or develop a new strategy utilizing the power of data.

How Lead Management Software can improve the conversion rate?

Not every lead knows exactly what their issue is. Recurrent and tailored communications, sales applications, and sales lead software to inform and educate customers. It involves educating people, setting priorities, and fostering trust.

You might need to modify how you handle leads to implement new software. However, the outcome will be less time wasted and higher conversion rates.

Additionally, you can always double-check reporting and analytics after you start using lead tracking to ensure that the results support these advancements.

When will you require Lead Management Software?

After learning about all its phases and advantages, you might be unsure whether your company needs a lead management system.

Number of Leads: You intend to improve your tactics to generate more leads. The number of leads will rise shortly.

TAT for leads: Without a way to promptly inform them, your sales staff is having trouble keeping up with the lead turn-around time.

Lack of openness in the lead assignment process: The sales staff is not coordinated regarding who is responsible for generating which lead. The sales funnel is being compromised as a result.

Updates on leads: It is difficult to track where the leads are in the sales funnel. Lead interactions are not documented, and no data are accessible for further investigation.

Low lead conversion ratio: This is a problem for your company. It is now challenging to identify the particular bottlenecks that are the cause.

Features of LEA Track Management System:

Here comes the most interesting part of the manual. In this chapter we will providing information in detail about each and every feature that we offer for you. But first the basics, let us understand in three points

Now let's dive into the features of our system:

We have divided our system into 4 important features:

A. Generate a lead:

Our lead generation will always be dedicated to your business plan. It will take into considerations all the factors including your geographical location, the size of the business, your existing client base, offered services, charges for your services, and everything in relation to the business. With these factors in play, we're able to find the best lead that qualifies the ICP (Ideal Customer Profile). It is important for us to store all your incoming leads into one place which will not only make it easier to adjust Ideal Customer profile according to the business requirements, having all leads at one place makes it quicker for us to identify the potential great leads that should be sent to Sales team which will then be converted into revenue for your business.

These leads are stored and analyzed to create a perfect plan that is passed onto Sales from Marketing through us. We act as the bridge that both sides of your business can trust in.

B. Enrich/Create an opportunity:

This is the part which is important in potentially converting the lead into an opportunity. Once we know which leads qualify the ICP criteria, we design a plan to nurture the lead. We come up with a plan that targets these leads to increase their interest in your business. When it comes to real estate lead management, there a lot of small things that can be done to keep the lead engaged. Things as simple as notifying them about open houses in the area they live or in the area of the property they have showed interest in. It can also be notifying them about all the services you offer through your business, the testimonials of the customer who opted your services explaining the experience they had with you.

These are just some of the general things that most likely would leave an impact on the lead. The main outcome of this process is for you to become the first person the lead thinks of when they decide to either sell or manage or buy a property. This is we believe the best way to nurture the leads into a loyal customer.

C. Conversion:

This is where the leads go through a rigorous filtering process to make sure Ideal Customer Profile (ICP) is adjust constantly to make sure none of the good leads slip by or bad leads get by to the next stage.

The constant adjustment of ICP will also raise the need of constant filtering of leads. Analyzing the leads not only includes filtering out of leads in comparison to ICP but also includes the tracking of behavioral pattern of the potential lead. The analysis of the behavioral pattern will give us the points at which we can target this lead and nurture them with constant updates.

This tracking will also enable us to gauge the interest of your leads through the different marketing strategies implemented, online and offline. This information will give us insight into the fact of how good the marketing strategies are, depending on which changes can be made to fit the targeted audience and achieve impeccable results.

This is the steps where we engage with the lead on different touch points and passed onto sales department that will change the lead to a sale, creating revenue to the business.
